“City of Norfolk Launches New Blog”

Recognizing that social media is one of many ways people use to find information, the City of Norfolk has launched a new online blog at cnblogs.org.

“Our blog is the latest method the City of Norfolk is using to communicate with citizens about staff, current happenings and city services,” said Diane Becker, City of Norfolk Communications Director.

$143,000,000. With dollar bills stacked end to end, that is more money than it would take to reach the farthest distance on the face of the earth from Nebraska. That is also the same amount on the City of Norfolk's asset list (according to the 2014 Comprehensive Annual Finance Report, CAFR). That includes everything from buildings and property, dump trucks, pay loaders, police cruisers, computers, fire engines, down to lawn mowers. That number does not include items and equipment that are less than $500 like chain saws, shovels, tools, furniture, or library books.

Hi, my name is Lyle Lutt and I am the Risk Manager for the City of Norfolk. My job is to help ensure that the citizens' $143 million is safe. So what does that entail? Although many of the projects and ideas that come through the city administration building involves input from each administration entity

The blog currently has articles written by Norfolk Public Library Director Jessica Chamberlain, City of Norfolk Risk Manager Lyle Lutt and Becker.

People who would like to be emailed when the blog has a new posting can click on “Follow blog via email”. It is also possible to leave a comment on the blog site.

“We invite people to add the city's blog to their list of ways to keep up with city happenings. They can follow us on Twitter at norfolkne and on Facebook at NorfolkNE. We also have loads of information on our website at ci.norfolk.ne.us and available with our Norfolk Area Connected app,” Becker said.

Plans are to have a new blog posting every two weeks.
